

ASENATH CAMPBELL.

[To accompany bill H. R. No. 179.]

MARCH 5, 1840.

Mr. CARR, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made the following

REPORT:

The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Asenath Campbell, widow of John Campbell, and former widow of James Miller, report :

That satisfactory proof has been exhibited, showing that her marriage to Miller took place in the year 1783, and that he died in the year 1788. It is admitted that said James Miller (as the rolls prove) served two years in the revolutionary war. There is also evidence before the committee showing that Campbell, the last husband, died on the 25th of April, 1833. The third section of the pension act of the 4th of July, 1836, extended the provisions of the pension law to widows of revolutionary soldiers whose marriage took place before the expiration of the last period of their service. The act of the 7th July, 1838, extends the marriage provision to 1st of January, 1794, and grants to the widow the annuity, or pension for five years, which might have been allowed to the husband in virtue of said act, if living at the time it was passed. Objection is made to this claim, upon the ground that Asenath Campbell was not the widow of James Miller, for whose services she claims a pension, but is the widow of John Campbell.

The committee are of opinion that she is entitled to the benefit of the act of 1838 ; and, in accordance with that opinion, report a bill.

Blair & Rives, printers.

ASSENATH CAMPBELL.
[To accompany bill H. R. No. 173.]

MARCH 5, 1840.

Mr. CARR, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made the following

REPORT:

The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Assenath Campbell, widow of John Campbell, and former widow of James Miller, report:

That satisfactory proof has been exhibited, showing that her marriage to Miller took place in the year 1783, and that he died in the year 1788. It is admitted that said James Miller (as the rolls prove) served two years in the revolutionary war. There is also evidence before the committee showing that Campbell, the last husband, died on the 26th of April, 1833. The third section of the pension act of the 4th of July, 1836, extended the provisions of the pension law to widows of revolutionary soldiers whose marriage took place before the expiration of the last period of their service. The act of the 7th July, 1838, extends the marriage provision to 1st of January, 1794, and grants to the widow the annuity or pension for five years, which might have been allowed to the husband in virtue of said act, if living at the time it was passed. Objection is made to this claim, upon the ground that Assenath Campbell was not the widow of James Miller, for whose services she claims a pension, but is the widow of John Campbell. The committee are of opinion that she is entitled to the benefit of the act of 1838; and in accordance with that opinion, report a bill.

Blair & River printers.